Fear Itself The New Deal

In "Fear Itself: The New Deal and the Origins of Our Time", Ira Katznelson argues, "The New Deal – the designation I use for the full period of Democratic Party rule that begins with FDR's election in 1932 and closes with Dwight Eisenhower's two decades later – reconsidered and rebuilt the country's long-established political order." (pg. 4-5) To this end, Katznelson "examines the fringes of liberal civilization and the ways in which illiberal political orders, both within ...

Eighty years ago yesterday, FDR famously said during his First Inaugural Address that "the only thing we have to fear is fear itself." The New Deal-which Katznelson argues should be seen as encompassing the period between the election of FDR in 1932 and the election of Eisenhower 20 years later-was, according to Fear Itself, conducted in the shadow of three major fears. First, there was the fear about whether democracy could survive the Great Depression as countries such as Germany, Italy ...
